Whether it's ancient fortresses, necropolises, or sacred mausoleums, each site provides a unique glimpse into the history and heritage of Karakalpakstan.

The State Museum of Arts named after I.V. Savitsky is a renowned museum located in Nukus, the capital city of Karakalpakstan, Uzbekistan. The museum is named after Igor Savitsky, a Russian painter and collector who dedicated his life to preserving and showcasing the art of Central Asia. The museum houses one of the largest collections of Russian avant-garde art in the world, with over 90,000 exhibits. It features works by prominent artists such as Alexander Volkov, Robert Falk, and Pyotr Konchalovsky. The collection also includes a significant number of works by local Karakalpak artists.

What makes the State Museum of Arts unique is its focus on forbidden art. During the Soviet era, many artists were censored or suppressed for their non-conformist styles. Savitsky, however, sought out and collected these "unofficial" works, preserving them for future generations. The museum's collection spans various artistic movements, including impressionism, expressionism, and abstract art. Visitors can admire landscapes, portraits, still lifes, and other genres, all reflecting the diverse artistic heritage of Central Asia.
